A gentleman of this city has placed in our possession a letterhead, upon the back of this which is printed a map headed " Memphis and her railroad system." The map occupies about one-third of the sheet, the remaining space being covered with three columns of closely-printed matter, signed by "L. J. Dupre." Both map and matter are thoroughly

THE MAP knowledge of geography possessed by its author. Mark Twain in locating the river Seine on the wrong side of Paris, and placing a bridge over a stretch of level land removed fifty miles from even a rivulet, is a flat failure as a burlesquer when compared to the sober efforts of the designer and draughtsman of "Memphis and her railroad system." To illustrate that "system," (on paper), he takes, with American continent, makes a black mark | Sixth street, near Ohio levee, is conductin the center of this slice and calls it ing his barber shop in a first-class style. Radiating lines are then supplied from the center to the limits of the circle, exactly after the manner in which spokes are adjusted in a wheel, and these are called railroads, or rather, the utmost contempt for modern geography, to locate cities and towns, which have heretofore been considered "not transferable," to such points on the "railway system" as best suits his purpose. He closes the career of the Mississippi river at Columbus, Ky,, and allows the waters of the beautiful Ohio to flow into the Indian Territory, leaving their outlet to the geographical imagination of the student.
